Chris and I met online through MySpace. I was deactivating my account and received a friend request. I looked through the pictures and said to myself, "he is totally adorable!"

I accepted the friend request and we bantaned for a few days before deciding we needed to meet. When we first set eyes on each other, I asked, "So do I look like my picture?" to which Chris replied, "even better." From that point forward we became virtually inseparable.

Our relationship's formative time was cut short after only five months of dating, when Chris was in a near-fatal motorcycle accident.

Chris was in a coma for nine weeks after the accident, and moved to Georgia for over a year to regain his physical and mental health. The accident left Chris without any memory of Orlando and he had no recollection of our relationship.

It was after a long time of getting to know each other that he fell in love with me all over again. We're convinced that when God chooses two people to be soulmates forever, not even death can separate them.

For us, getting married is the easy part; we already lived 'till death do us part,' and we have nothing to fear and live to love without limits.
